TIRING the years 1887-88 many new remedies have been prof I J fered for use in dental medicine and surgery, most of them being on trial by dental therapists at this time. Included in this list, which is not complete, may be found creolin, sodium fluorsilicate, guaiacol, several coal-tar derivatives, and the active principles of many of the essential oils. The activity in chemical circles is so great that medical literature is burdened with the number of remedies belonging to the antipyretic and the anti-neuralgic classes. Among the latter may be mentioned antipyrin and antifebrin, constitutional remedies of great value in facial neuralgia. The continued study of microbes and the lists of germicides and disinfectants to annihilate them go side by side. No sooner is a new microbe discovered than the therapist offers a choice collection of disinfectants, from which selection is to be made for destroying the spores and rendering operations free from septic infection. The tendency of present practice in dental therapeusis is to use such medicaments as are least harmful to normal tissues, but which will afford a certain destruction of the microbes present. I wish to call your attention for a few moments to guaiacol, a derivative of wood creasote. It is a light straw-colored liquid, pungent to the taste, but less objectionable to smell than its parent. Guaiacol and cresol are both isolated from creasote, and they may be considered the active...
