Now this disposition makes us act against all those in whom this contrariety appears. When therefore it happens that we either really have those qualities, which to some are the object of aversion , or that we make our selves known unto them, only by such particularities, as. give them reason to imagine we have them; it ought not seem strange to us, that their disposition should produce its natural effects against us j it would have done the fame against any other whatsoever, and it is not particularly we whom they hate, tis him in general who has . such and such ofensive qualities. XL. In general, we have an aversion sot those that are covetous, self, interested, and presumptuous i we in particular are believd guilty of these faults: 1 his general aversion therefore acts against us. What is it that offends us herein . Is it this general aversion No, this aversion in some fort is just and reasonable; for one thus qualified, deserves we should have some kind of aversion for. him. Is it the judgment they make of us But this judgment is formd upon some appearances, Part n. peace amongst 9eti. 27 s which may really be flight, but for all that are strong enough to carry it with those who sec them.
