Excerpt: .higher departments to the greater gods, and the less important to those of low rank, until every portion of the vast realm of nature--sun and moon and stars, rivers and hills, trees and flowers, birds and beasts; every department of human labour--buying and selling, sowing and reaping; every stage of human life--birth, marriage, death, ---each and all had their own presiding deities. In the same way, the varying conditions of the human body, and the different affections of the human mind--health and sickness, joy and sorrow, faith and love, hope and fear, virtue and vice--were elevated into so many distinct objects of worship. There was a god of thieves; there was a god of drains and of evil smells. When we read of deities who had one special function to perform, and who are never heard of in any other relation--such as the god Vaticanus, who impelled the child to its first cry, and the god Fabulinus, who taught it to lisp its first word--we can hardly doubt that these were regarded not as separate and distinct personalities, but simply as the various attitudes or relations which the Deity bears to the creatures he has made. We can quite understand how, with such views, the Roman had no more difficulty in effecting changes in his Pantheon than in his home or State arrangements, displacing one god for another more in favour or in fashion at the time, or admitting new deities from other lands with...
