Excerpt: . chapter xvi. enfranchisement. bring the missal, Jan and put it bore beside my bed. The enervating July weather so prostrated Allice that she had found herself for several days unable to rise. The old nurse placed the small stand beside her, and then brought the precious vellum manuscript for which her mistress had asked. Lay it open at the representations of the Virgin, and then raise me up a trifle, the invalid said. The esteem in which her mistress held this book had greatly impressed Janet with its sacredness, and with something of reverence in her manner she turned the ancient leaves upon which Time had laid his finger, changing their pristine fairness to a yellow tinge, mellowing and softening the glory of color which the artist had placed upon them. Nothing now afforded Allice the satisfaction that she found in the illuminated...
